Bad Salzuflen

The idyllic town, through which the Salze River meanders, impresses with its pretty town centre. The Salzsiederstadt harmoniously blends history and modernity. Many of the richly decorated half-timbered houses in the old town were built in the 16th and 17th centuries and still bear witness to Bad Salzuflen's economic prosperity in those days. It was precisely during this period that the European architectural style of the Renaissance took on a special character in the Weser region. The historical centre of Bad Salzuflen is no exception. The imposing graduation works in the heart of the town look like a huge open-air inhalatorium.. <https://www.stadt-bad-salzuflen.de>

Hexenbürgermeisterhaus and witch hunt

The house was purchased in 1625 by the merchant Dietrich Cothmann and his wife Catharina Goehausen. Catharina Goehausen was accused of witchcraft, charged, and sentenced. She was executed in 1654. Today's Hexenbürgermeisterhaus was thus the home of a victim of the witch trials in the mid-17th century. With around 100 executions, this period was one of the most intensive persecution periods in the city's history.

Junkerhaus in Lemgo

The vision of the artist Karl Junker - building like a dream! A two-storey half-timbered building with a brick base and a square ground plan. From 1891 until his death in 1912, Karl Junker lived in the house and constantly worked on its furnishings. The Junkerhaus is a home, an artist's house and a work of art in its own right.

Externsteine in Horn-Bad Meinberg – Nature meets Culture

A medieval, sacred site in the midst of bizarre sandstone cliffs. The characteristic rock formation rises up to 40 metres into the air. Both the viewing platform with its 19th-century staircase, the medieval grotto complex and the relief of the Descent from the Cross, which was carved into the rocks by medieval stonemasons, are of worldwide significance. <https://de.wikipedia.org/wiki/Externsteine>
